Whether your depositions are remote or in-person, our expert videographers are ready to capture your next deposition. Here are just a few ways that a videographer can add value to your case.

Preserves Witness Testimony

In case of a death or other extreme circumstance that could arise during the trial, it is always best to plan for the worst. Videography would help prevent losing the time and effort already put into a case and plays an important role in preserving in extremis testimony.

Allows Absent Court Room Witness Testimony

If your witness is unable to physically be in the court room, previously recorded video deposition testimony can be played back for the jury.

Captures Non-Verbal Communication

Videography captures the witness as a real person, giving the jury a better picture. This includes facial expressions, emotions, mannerisms, and even physical pain – revealed in a way that a paper transcript simply cannot accomplish. Being able to see body language in addition to a witness' words can show so much more depth.

Clears Up Credibility

Video allows the opportunity to protect witness' credibility. If there are any discrepancies in witness testimony, the video can simply be played back for clarification.

Tells the Best Story

Being able to hear and see the witness give their testimony really does present a story, which is easier for a jury to follow along with. This makes it easier to capture and retain the attention of said jury, and even the judge as well.
